The islands were uninhabited prior to Portuguese colonisation in the 15th century but soon became an integral part of the African slave trade. Today, the islands are known for pottery, hand dyed textiles, paintings, instruments and sculptures, highlighting their unique cultural blend. Make your way to Alexandre Albuquerque Square for a local seafood lunch while surrounded by intriguing colonial architecture and lush greenery.

With a desert climate on the south side and high mountains at its centre, the scenery will leave you spellbound. Largely untouched by tourism, the island will be yours almost exclusively. Explore the island's most populous city, Porto Novo, which began life as a tiny fishing port just over a century ago. You'll have time to try the famous Cape Verde rum, or 'grogue' as it's called.
